Flintshire has a rich and diverse history including ancient Roman occupation to the vast industrial past which is scattered across the county landscape.

The local area has seen an ever-developing landscape morph over the course of history, with each new development leaving a fresh mark on the pages of Flintshire's archives.

Flintshire hosts a wide variety of historical interests, from medieval castles left to the annals of time, mining sites and factories which arose out of the Industrial Revolution to the spots of culture and institutions of higher knowledge which have developed in the county.

The numerous locations will inform, educate and entertain even the most knowledgeable of historians.

The towns of Buckley, Mold, Flint, Connah's Quay and Holywell also host town heritage trails, which allow you to follow in the footsteps of the historical figures before you and uncover some of the important historical sites and scenes which have played out in the local area.

These trails and more can be located on the North East Wales Digital Trails App - found on the Apple and Google Play stores – which gives you a path map along with a range of multimedia information about the trail.

On the next pages you will see a handful of spots which echo the changes and variety which can be found about Flintshire's past.

Running up along the southern side of the River Dee before being the entryway into the Irish sea, Flintshire's coast stretches for 25 miles and forms part of the Wales Coast Path.

Often a port of call to transport goods and services at the height of the Industrial Revolution, the county's coastline has undergone a rapid transformation, with wildlife and clear skies reclaiming significant aspects of the sandy shores which make up the coastline.

Whether you're searching for shells at Talacre beach or watching the fishermen in action at Greenfield Dock, breathing in the sea air never felt so good.

In this coming section you will see a selection of interesting and unique locations along the Flintshire coast which rolls everything the local area has to offer into one.

Head to the dedicated coastal page on the Flintshire County Council website for comprehensive resources and guides.
